THE NORTHERN LIGHTS

Across the darkened sky they flash in splendour
 Dancing, flitting, then eerily dashing away
 Reds and greens and blues all ever changing
 The aurora borealis, like a jewelled spray.

Quickly do they come and quick do they depart
 Weirdly lighting up the heavens as they flee
 These ever changing ribbons of glory and of awe
 Like moonlight on a stormy billowing sea.

Their mysteries are unknown and their tales have not been heard,
 Of the bleak and frozen land from whence they rise,
 The glorious Northern Lights of the barren Arctic lands,
 The midnight rainbow of the Northern skies.

WENDIGO

There's a night in an Indian legend
 Where the Wendigo walks again;
 A chieftain killed once in a battle
 Who brings his revenge to men.

The conditions are right for the Wendigo
 When thunder racks the sky;
 Mothers clasp loved ones to heaving breasts
 And pray he'll pass them by.

The brave and dauntless warrior
Hides a tear that blinds his eye
For the lightning is bright, and the thunder right
And perhaps his baby will die.

Oh, what grief so poignant!
A heavy cross to bear
When the baby starts to whimper
And they sense that 'he' is there.

Every louder clap of thunder
Is answered with a sigh
For the Wendigo is seeking
For a baby who will die.

Oh, such agony of feeling
In the heart he fills with dread!
Each moment is so precious
Just one kiss before he's dead!

A vigil of pain, a night of grief
For they know that a baby must die;
Evil walks with the Wendigo
When thunder ricks the sky.
